Abstract

This study investigates the relationships between Christianity and social network composition. We recruit 100 Christians and 100 non-religious people, aged 12 to 25 years old. Findings confirm that religion and religiosity are related to social network composition; but do not support that commitment is related to social network composition. Although our findings do not show significant correlation between commitment and social network composition among Christians, it may be too early to conclude that commitment is not related to social network composition. This is particular the case in the light of the conceptual problems of commitment and sufficient evidence in the past demonstrating commitment and social relationships’ correlation.